3 WAYS

THAT WITHDRAWING FROM A CLASS AFFECTS YOUR FINANCIAL AID

The best way to avoid adjustments to your financial aid is to be enrolled as a full-time student and complete your classes each term. We know that it cannot always be avoided, so we want you to know how withdrawing from or dropping a class impacts you academically and financially.

1 MONEY

- Withdrawing does not cancel your tuition and fees
- If you drop courses and fall below 12 credits in a term, you may be subject to a prorated reduction of Federal Direct Loans
- Students who withdraw fully from the College may be required to repay a portion of the financial aid back to the college
- Certain federal student aid programs have limited usage eligibility and/or aggregate Borrowing limits.

2 TIMING

- Withdrawing from classes extends the time and cost of your degree
- Use the Add/Drop period to maintain your full-time status
- Course drop after add/drop? Consider adding a 7-week course to maintain your full-time status

3 ACADEMIC PROGRESS

- Withdrawing from classes and not adding another course will affect your academic progress
- Continued practice of dropping or withdrawing from coursework will jeopardize your financial aid
- Financial aid offers are made with the program being completed in 8 semesters
