Oil train snuggles deadly risk into our backyards, again

By David Skube, Nation's Capital

In what has become a familiar annual event, oil train oil trains are parked along the tracks in Brunswick, Georgia, and other nearby communities.

The trains carry crude oil and are a common sight in many parts of the country. Some communities have raised concerns about the safety of these trains and the risk they pose to the local population.

The trains are often parked near homes, businesses, and schools, raising concerns about the potential for accidents.

In Brunswick, Georgia, a recent report by the Federal Railroad Administration found that the oil trains posed a significant risk to the local community.

The report recommended that the trains be rerouted from residential areas.

However, the trains continue to be parked near homes and businesses, raising concerns about the ongoing risk to the community.

In addition to the safety concerns, there are also economic impacts associated with the parking of oil trains in residential areas.

The trains can cause property values to decline and can affect the ability of residents to sell their homes.

Overall, the parking of oil trains near homes and businesses is a serious concern that needs to be addressed.

The trains should be rerouted to safer locations and the local communities should be consulted in the decision-making process.

It is important to prioritize the safety and well-being of the residents over economic interests.

The local government and regulatory bodies need to take action to ensure that the trains are parked in safer locations.